Good Morning from Apple News

It's February 28, 2020.

Here's what you need to know.

Coronavirus meltdown

- Even as health officials warn the spread of the virus is all but inevitable, developments suggest the U.S. is underprepared for the threat. Diagnostic kits sent to local health providers aren't working, and the CDC's testing criteria meant an infected patient in California wasn't screened for the coronavirus for days. Most cases are mild, which is good and bad news: A full recovery is common, but because the symptoms aren't severe, those infected may be unknowingly spreading the virus. REUTERS
- The stock market had one of its worst days since the financial crisis amid fears the economic fallout could be worse than previously expected. The S&P 500 index entered correction territory yesterday when it dropped 12% from a recent peak, and shares are projected to fall further when markets reopen this morning. THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

An escalation in Syria: An official said at least 33 Turkish soldiers were killed in an airstrike conducted by the Russian-backed Syrian government, making it more likely that Turkey could strike back with a full-scale military operation. Meanwhile, the Syrian regime's offensive near its Turkish border has created the worst humanitarian crisis in the country's nine-year civil war. NEWSWEEK

South Carolina's Democratic primary is tomorrow, and all eyes are on Joe Biden. It's a do-or-die moment for the moderate, who's counting on the support of black voters. As for front-runner Bernie Sanders, Democrats want to see if he can appeal to a broad swath of people. CBS NEWS
